David Beriss

Associate Professor in the Department of Anthropology

“Tacos, Kale, and Vietnamese Po’Boys: The Re-Creolization of Food in Postdiluvian New Orleans”

David Beriss teaches Anthropology at the University of New Orleans. He is the co-editor (with David Sutton) of “The Restaurants Book: Ethnographies of Where We Eat” (2007, Berg) and author of “Black Skins, French Voices: Caribbean Ethnicity and Activism in Urban France” (2004, Westview Press) and co-editor of the foodanthro.com blog. He is currently pursuing a research project focusing on the relationship between foodways and ideas about cultural distinctiveness in post-diluvian New Orleans, although more broadly his work focuses on southern U.S. culture, ethnicity, and applied anthropology, as well as on France, Europe and the French Caribbean.

Email: dberiss@uno.edu